Revolution in home care for old people

Cash deal gives choice over services Move aimed at baby boom generation

by Jo Revill

ELDERLY PEOPLE are to be given money to pay for their own care in a move being hailed as one of the most radical changes in social care for the baby boom generation. They will have the right to decide how and where they spend the cash, instead of social workers dictating what they can do. Personal budgets will also be set up for younger disabled people frustrated by their lack of choice.

Under the system, being rolled out from next April, older people or their chosen relatives will set up bank accounts into which councils will pay a monthly sum. Beneficiaries will receive the cash after means tests taking account of their health and personal needs. They will then be able to shop around for the best packages of care, and, for instance, may decide to spend more on cleaners, or help with food.

The move follows the six-month Dignity at Home campaign by The Observer, which has called for far more responsive services for the elderly. One key aim, backed by several charities, was to give people the right to choose their own home helps and personal carers.

After a series of pilot projects, ministers have become convinced that individual budgets are essential as the 'babyboomer' generation, moving towards retirement, will demand far more control of their daily lives as well as a higher standard of service.

Around 900,000 people over 65 are currently unable to live independently without help, a number due to rise to more than 1.3 million by 2025, putting enormous pressure on services.
